

Problem statement: While there are many review sites for video games, many of them are too focused on getting views and clicks rather than helping people. Even if sites like Kotaku or IGN exist that are dedicated to gaming news, they have been observed to sacrifice journalistic integrity and disregard the ideas and feedback of the gaming community if it means getting their article out there. And since every review is only based on the opinion of one person, it is not an objective look at the quality or work behind the games. If that one person is new to the genre or doesn't enjoy the kind of game they're reviewing, that bias will leak into whatever they write. One person's views can only help that one person, and will always be inadequate for helping the masses to make an informed decision.
